The British executive power possesses all the authority proper to a sovereign, but he is surrounded by a triple line of checks and balances, and has no power greater than that of the authority, as they are personally responsible, and not even those royal authorities can exempt them from this responsibility. The executive is commander-in-chief of the army and navy, he makes peace and declares war, but Parliament annually determines what sums are to be paid to these military forces. While the courts and judges are dependent on the executive power, the laws originate in the people and are made by Parliament. Give Venice such an executive power in the person of a president chosen by the people, or their representatives, and you will have taken a great step toward national happiness. No matter what citizen occupies this office, he will be aided by the Constitution, and if he acts contrary to the law, if he attempts to infringe upon the law, or his ministers will desert him, thereby isolating him from the Republic, and they will even bring charges against him in the Senate.
